1. Course Description

In this class, we will consider not only the basics of psychology, but also our relationship with the "psychologized" world, based on the various events that abound in our daily lives. Specifically, through the process of exploring the answers to questions submitted by students, we will decipher how our understanding of humans and the world has been "psychologized. In the first semester, two topics in particular will be addressed: "memory" and "learning."

In this class, the lectures will be conducted using social networking services (SNS), with real-time communication between the faculty and students. Students are expected to bring their own smart phones to class.
