

心理学研究演習Ⅰ

Syllabus Number

SEM-301

Compulsory 2
credit

SHIKISHIMA, Chizuru

1. Course Description

The human mind is influenced by the genes an individual carries, but it also reflects the circumstances of the moment. It also depends on the type of family in which the individual was raised and at what stage of development. It can also be influenced by the type of society in which the individual lives and the context of the times. In other words, the human psyche is subject to constant change, both within individuals and among people.

In this course, we will examine the factors that cause psychological differences by analyzing data from psychological surveys that measure these diverse human minds using questionnaires. The aim is then for each student taking the course to raise issues from within contemporary society and to explore the interactions that occur between the individual mind and society.